7 Reasons Why You Should Work Abroad

In today's world there are so many options for long-term traveling. Aside from hopping on a plane and backpacking your way through Europe you can study abroad, volunteer with the Peace Corps or similar organization, work on a cruise ship, become an au pair for a family, join an intern abroad program or simply find a job abroad.

While the idea of working abroad is exciting for many people most of us just can't move across the world to work in different countries.

Finding a job abroad is one of the best options. You can make money while you travel. Working abroad allows you to take control of your life, to meet incredible people and create new experiences every day.

So in an effort to open your eyes to the wonderful world of working holidays, here are 7 reasons why working abroad is a great way to travel and gives weightage to your resume after you come home.

1. Career development

If you were able to move your entire life to a new country where you didn't know anyone that's impressive! Even if you take a job abroad right out of college, completely separate from a specific employer's request, it might help you to get a job when you return. Working abroad shows that you are adventurous and willing to try new things and gives you an advantage over others. You will master another language. You will understand the work cultures and know the way people interact in business.

2. New skills

Working abroad gives you the chance to do all sorts of crazy jobs you'd probably never even think of trying at home.

Most of the skills you'll learn, like how to pick an apple or the quickest way to put on a duvet cover, probably won't specifically benefit your future career but any new skill shows initiative.

At the very least will make a great story when you're being interviewed for a new job.

3. Travels

Let's be honest – the travel opportunities of living abroad are amazing. It doesn't matter where you go because it's different to where you came from and that means new and exciting travel destinations that are all of more accessible. All of a sudden, every weekend turns into a potential adventure!

4. Earn and save money

Usually overseas employers provide employees with air tickets, VISA, medical insurance, duty meals, transportation, accommodation and other bonuses. Such income is equivalent much higher salary.

Some big cities are notoriously expensive, but not all of them are. Especially if you will get such bonuses from your employer.

5. Personal growth

Moving overseas or even doing a temporary contract abroad is great at ripping you out of your comfort zone. And when else do you grow as much as when you're out of your normal routine? Even if you're not the biggest fan of change, you know that it's good for you. So if you need that push (and we all do at some point), why not take a job abroad and get paid for your travel?

6. Real freedom

While you're working you won't exactly be free, but going abroad to start a new life can be a difficult experience. Once you discover that it's not as scary or difficult as you first thought, it will be like a whole new world opens up to you.

Having the confidence to go anywhere in the world to make a living really gives a great sense of freedom. Once you feel as though you can go anywhere and still manage to support yourself, the world is truly open for you.

7. Friendship

You'll meet a lot of other travelers as you go no matter where you are but most meetings will be short. Stopping to work will allow you the time to develop lasting, meaningful friendships with other travelers and coworkers.

It makes saying goodbye at the end more difficult, but the memories will last a longer and you'll have new friends to visit all over the world.
